INTRODUCTION.

I am about to recount to the people of Alabama and to the world, the principal events of the war, connected with the service of the 14th Regiment Alabama Volunteers. Perhaps some one may think I attempt a task beyond my strength; but no man so well knows himself as not to attempt too much. Yet I shall not have to reproach myself with having omitted any commendable act, or to record any deed unworthy of the State or Government they have so faithfully served. Whatever I may say, I aim to speak the truth; and if I should mention anything not conformable to the general interest of the country, it will be an error of the head and not of the heart, and I declare in advance that I disavow it. It is pleasant to read a good history, but it is not so easy to write one. A large portion of this work I am aware, will disagree with impressions made upon the minds of the people of Alabama and elsewhere, by the stories of unjust and prejudiced minds. I ask only one favor of the reader, and that is, question the officers of the Regiment, who have a right to know, before he disputes any act of the Regiment I herein relate.

M: B. HURST.

14TH ALABAMA REGIMENT.

In presenting this work to the public, I deem it unnecessary to attempt an explanation of the causes of the war. Suffice it to say, that the thunder concealed in the cloud which, for over fifty years, darkened our political horizon, burst forth on Fort Sumter, on the 11th day of April, 1861. This victory to the rebels hastened preparations in all the seceded States to meet the Union army on the border. When the first demand was made for volunteers, (so eager was the South to show to the North and to the world, that they intended to be free,) that it was a race to Montgomery, then the Confederate Capitol, to be received first. About the 1st of August, 1861, the 14th Alabama Regiment rendezvoused at Auburn, Alabama, and organized as follows:

Hon. T. J. JUDGE, of Montgomery, Alabama, Colonel.

D. W. BAINE, of Hayneville, Lieutenant-Colonel.

O. H. K. McLEMORE, of Lafayette, Chambers County, and formerly Lieutenant in U. S. A., Major.

HISTORY OF THE 14TH ALABAMA REGT.

On the 7th of August, 1861, this Regiment was mustered into service, by Major Calhoun, C. S. A. For some reason unknown to the author, the Regiment did not move immediately to the seat of war. They remained in camp at Auburn, Alabama, and were partially initiated into the hardships of a soldier's life. On the 6th of October, 1861, they left for Huntsville, Alabama, at which place they arrived Oct. 8th. They remained at Huntsville until November 4th. The Regiment was ordered to report at Richmond, Va. This move was very injurious to the health of the men composing the Regiment, a majority of whom were just recovering from measles. They arrived at Richmond Nov. 7th, and camped on the Old Fair ground, west of the city. Here the Regiment first received pay from the Government. On the 14th of November, the Regiment was ordered to Evansport, Va. They arrived there on the 17th. Here the men began to experience in truth the hardships of a soldier's life; having been raised in Alabama, and the other Cotton States, the exposure which necessarily attends a soldier's life, on the bleak shore of the Potomac, was more than many of them could stand. Hundreds were sick, a great many of whom died. So fatal was their sickness, that by the 1st of January, 1862, a little over a month, not quite two hundred were reported for duty. Colonel Judge, then in command, asked to be moved; but his petition was unnoticed by the commanding General, T. Holmes. The Colonel then applied and got leave to visit Richmond; and by his own exertions and influence, had the Regiment ordered by the Secretary of War to Richmond. The Regiment arrived at Richmond, January 3d, 1862, and was quartered at the Barracks, west of the city, known as Camp Winder. Every effort was made by the Commanders of the Regiment to restore the health of the men. Here it remained in garrison life until the 27th of March, when the enemy were threatening Yorktown from Fortress Monroe. The health of the Regiment was partially restored. We were ordered to Yorktown; we landed there on the evening of the 27th of March. The next morning we marched out some four miles west of the town, and camped near Winn's Mill. Nothing here disturbed the regular routine of camp duty, save an occasional rumor that the Yankees were advancing. On the 5th day of April, early in the morning, couriers were riding rapidly in every direction, from whom we learned that it was supposed that the enemy were advancing in force on Dam No. 1, situated about three-fourths of a mile below our camp. The long roll was beaten, the Regiment formed and marched down to the dam above named; we were drawn up in line of battle, and marched forward to the water's edge, and here we remained four days and nights. It was while the Regiment was at this place, that four men, belonging to Company G, viz: — Allen, — Allen, — Allen, and — Lindsey, were posted across the river to watch and give intimation of the advance of the enemy; but not being properly instructed, and by their negligence, they were captured. The morning of the 9th of April, we were marched back to our old camp; the whole Regiment was put to work building breast-works in full view of and in range of the enemy's guns—the men worked night and day. It was raining almost all the time. At night the enemy amused and interested our men with their rockets; in day time their shells kept a continued whiz, whiz, whiz, over our heads. A few men however, were wounded by the explosion of shells, and one or two killed by the sharp-shooters of the enemy. General J. E. Johnston, at that time in command of the Army of the Peninsula, ordered a retreat; consequently, on the 3d day of May, we had to leave our fortified position, which had cost us so much labor, amidst danger. We took the road for Williamsburg, leaving all of our tents, cooking utensils, together with a great many rations we had on hand. The road to Williamsburg was almost impassable for artillery and baggage wagons. The men, who were nearly exhausted from exposure, want of sleep, and having been at work night and day for over two weeks, marched slowly; and many, who attempted to try to save their clothing and blankets, by packing them, were soon exhausted; consequently, thousands of blankets, overcoats, shirts, drawers and pants were thrown away. We arrived at Williamsburg in the evening; the next day the enemy's cavalry were pursuing us closely. We marched through the town of Williamsburg, and halted about two miles north of the town. Late in the evening, the roar of musketry, about three miles below Williamsburg, gave us information that the advance guard of the enemy had attacked our rear. Soon we were in line, and marched back through the town, and was posted in a redoubt, near Fort Magruder. Every man lay down that night with his musket by his side, expecting that the coming day would bring with it a fight. Late at night the rain began falling in torrents, much to the discomfiture of boys without tents. Every one seemed to care only for his gun and ammunition, as he expected to have use for it the next day. At length the grey streak in the eastern horizon gave warning that day was approaching. Every man was up and ready for any emergency. The clouds hung heavily, casting a gloom over the place. The redoubt in which we were posted was dusty when we entered it Sunday night. Monday morning it was ankle deep in mud. At ten minutes after 8 o'clock, the batteries of the enemy, on the right and left, opened on Fort Magruder. Our artillery replied slowly, as ammunition was scarce. This artillery duel lasted until near 11 o'clock. General Longstreet sent forward a Brigade, in a skirt of woods, lying to our right. Soon the skirmishers of the enemy and our own were engaged, each side falling back to its reserve. The two armies advanced. At 20 minutes after 2 o'clock, in the evening, they opened fire; from this time until near 11 o'clock at night, the roar of cannon, and the rattle of musketry was unceasing. The rain was pouring down. Three companies of the 14th Alabama Regiment being posted in a redoubt near the one in which the other seven companies were, to support a battery; they were in command of Major O. H. K. McLemore. A portion of Pryor's Brigade, to which we belonged, being already engaged, the three companies, under Major McLemore, viz: Company B, Captain J. S. Williamson, Company G, Lieut. W. M. Bell, Company K, Captain A. C. Wood, were ordered forward. Fearlessly they rushed forward through the drenching rain and deep mud, to succor their suffering comrades, the gallant little Major, the pride of the Regiment, leading them. Soon the rattle of musketry began at the point they entered the woods. At the first fire from the enemy, Major McLemore's horse was killed from under him. He dismounted from the already fallen animal, and with a smile, as if nothing had happened, waved his sword, and ordered the men to follow him. The woods were very thick; the enemy were lying down, waiting for us to advance. What a mistaken idea they had of the courage of our men. The Major was coolly giving orders to the boys, when two Yankees took a fair crack at him. The eagle eye of Corporal G. W. Courtney, in his eagerness for the fight, raised his gun and shot one of them dead. The Major turned to the gallant Corporal and said, very well, George, load and try another. During the balance of the day, the three companies, under Major McLemore, were engaged in that desperate battle, the result of which is too well known to be mentioned here. I was sent on the field late in the day, to assist in bringing a wounded soldier off; and while looking for the wounded and suffering soldier, had a chance of viewing the whole of the battle-ground, except that part on which the two armies were then engaged. The scene beggars description. Swords, guns, pistols, bowie-knives, cartridge boxes, knapsacks, haversacks and blankets were scattered in every direction.

Captain J. S. Williamson, of Company B, Captain A. C. Wood, of Company K, and Lieutenant W. M. Bell, of Company G, all behaved themselves honorably. At 1 o'clock at night, we took the road for Richmond. The cause of our retreat, after so signal a victory, was, I suppose, that ammunition was so scarce, that we would be unable to continue the fight the next day. The roads were awful; the mud so deep, and the whole earth was so rotten, that I saw stout men, who ventured to go through it, rather than pick their way through the bushes, get mired, and were unable to extricate themselves without assistance from their fellow soldiers. Many of the men were sick; some entirely unable to travel. Many were sent forward to the different Hospitals at Petersburg, where they died. Others, who were unable to keep up with the Regiment until transportation could be furnished, sank by the road side, exhausted. Every effort was made by the Surgeon in charge, and our noble Quartermaster, D. W. Hinkle, to furnish transportation to the sick, who were unable to travel. The principal Surgeon of the Regiment, J. B. Gaston, was left at Williamsburg to care for the wounded. Captain Ferrie Henshaw, of the Commissary Department, and his assistant, J. S. Earle, were untiring in their efforts to procure rations for the men; but the many thousands of soldiers who were ahead of us, stripped the country of everything eatable. We arrived at Richmond on the 22d day of May; camped east of the city, near the Fair Field Race Paths, and were partially recovered from our severe march; having been in line of battle every day since we left Williamsburg.

On the 31st day of May, every man was ordered to have forty rounds of cartridge. The roar of cannon was already heard in the direction of Williamsburg. Lieut. Colonel D. W. Baine, at that time was in the hospital, and hearing that the Regiment was ordered to be in readiness, hurried to it. The Regiment being in line of battle, marched to the battle ground of Seven Pines; the weather was very warm. In the evening it began raining. We arrived at the spot where the enemy had first been attacked by our troops, and driven from their camps, leaving their tents standing with kettles full of beef, peas and coffee, ready for eating and drinking. The mangled dead and wounded were still lying on the field, many of whom had fallen in water sufficiently deep to cover them while lying. I saw several, where the 6th Alabama charged on them, lying dead, with the bayonets of Alabamians and of the enemy run through each other. Just at dark we halted for a few minutes, and the Regiment was ordered to assist in removing these noble men to the nearest house, where they could be attended by the surgeons. Late in the night, the rain still pouring down, the Regiment was ordered to take position in front. The men sank down in the mud to rest, expecting that the coming day they would be called upon to perform the severest task for which they volunteered. As day was dawning the next morning, the enemy opened fire on us while our men were eating a snack. As quick as thought every man was at his gun and in line; skirmishers were sent forward, the pickets of the enemy falling back. Soon the Regiment was ordered forward, and the battle which followed, though not as hotly contested as others have been since, was sufficient to try the nerves of the officers and men. Lieutenant G. J. Bankston and Corporal E. W. Ray, of Company C, privates W. Dozier and S. A. Brewster, of Company D, and others of the Regiment were conspicuous for their daring.

The enemy having been defeated, the heavy rain which had fallen made the swamp of the Chickahominy inaccessible. Our forces fell back to our camp near Richmond—nothing unusual transpiring until the 26th of June. Lieut. Colonel Baine made a short speech to the companies of the Regiment, informing them of the expected battle, asking them to remember the State they had the honor to represent. The Regiment was formed, and taking the road from Richmond to Mechanicsville, the morning of the 27th of June, we were in line of battle near the battle ground of Gaines' Mill—Lieutenant Colonel Baine commanding. Major A. C. Wood, formerly Captain of Company K, was also present. The firing had already begun in front. The 14th Alabama was ordered forward to support the 14th Louisiana in a charge on the strong position of the enemy; for some reason unknown to the author, the charge was not made. We were suffered to lie in an open field, exposed to the murderous fire of the enemy, and were not suffered to fire a gun. We lost several gallant men, and several wounded. A deep ditch was in front; the Louisianians succeeded in throwing a bridge across it, and began crossing; the enemy ceased firing and began retreating; our men push forward; a pursuit of some six miles, and we again came upon the pickets of the enemy. Lieut. J. T. Greenwood, of Company D, was in command of a party of skirmishers from our Regiment; he succeeded in driving their pickets back to their reserve. Our whole Brigade, which was composed of the 14th Alabama, 14th Louisiana, 3d Virginia, and St. Paul's Battalion, was thrown forward in an open field, in order, I suppose, to draw their forces out; but instead of drawing out their forces, we only drew the fire from their batteries; one shell falling in Company A, killing one or two, and wounding several. We fell back from this position some twenty yards, and sent forward another party of skirmishers. A few minutes after 2 o'clock, we received orders from Gen'l R. A. Pryor, to advance. We advanced some three-fourths of a mile, and halted for a moment—being near the enemy. A few hasty orders were given to the men, when the command was given to forward, and in an advance of a hundred yards we were in full view and range of the enemy's musketry. They opened fire on us with terrible effect; but still our columns advanced to within fifty yards of their nearest breastwork; we halted for a moment, and a few rounds from our boys dislodged them. Our men rushed forward yelling, which, with the rattle of musketry, echoed among the hills for miles around; they attempted to retreat in order, but we pressed them too closely. Many instances of daring might here be mentioned. General Pryor was everywhere where the firing was hottest.

Lieutenant Colonel Baine's daring excelled that of any man I ever saw, amidst the hail-storm of bullets. He was cool, and apparently as self-possessed as if he was in his tent at camp. The company officers did their duty nobly; among whom I noticed, was Lieut. N. M. Smith and C. M. Sneed, of Company A; Company F, Lieut. J. C. Strickland; of Company D, Lieut. J. T. Greenwood—he had been conspicuous for his daring throughout the day, and fell mortally wounded soon afterwards; of Company I, Captain J. T. Bell, Lieut. E. Folk, and Lieut. J. P. Shaffer—Captain Bell fell mortally wounded soon afterwards, and expired on the field; of Company C, Lieut. now Captain M. L. Barber; of Company H, Lieut. now Captain W. E. O'Brien and Lieut. C. H. Lamberth; of E, Captain W. F. Dunson and Lieut. J. T. McLain; of K, Captain G. W. Taylor; of G, Capt. R. A. McCord, and Lieut. G. T. Verdrey.

Many of the officers of the Regiment were sick. Lieut. now Capt. J. A. Terrell, of Company G, not having recovered from his wounds received at Williamsburg. Among the non-commissioned officers and privates, deeds of daring were so numerous, that I may say the whole Regiment did its duty. We pressed them closely for three-fourths of a mile. Our men were falling fast from the grape and canister they were pouring into us at every step. Our men halted for a moment; a short consultation among the remnant of officers and privates, composing our Brigade: they quickly decided to take that battery—Alabamians, Virginians and Louisianians. Many of the Louisianians, who were not so fleet as the Alabamians and Virginians, threw down their guns and empty cartridge-boxes, and rushed forward with their bayonets in hand. Soon the artillerists left their guns, when Corp'l James Giles, color guard, and at this time bearing the colors, planted them on the guns in the battery. The shouts of our boys echoed among the hills for miles around. The battle is ended for the day; night coming on, the Colonel could find only twelve men of his Regiment; the balance of the men lay on the battle field all night. Early next morning they were rallying around their commander, and though much fatigued by the day's labor previous, yet ready to obey any command that was given. By 8 o'clock in the morning, they were again on the battle field. Late in the day our Generals discovered that it was the intention of the enemy to retreat to James river, and take shelter under their gun boats.

On Sunday morning, Pryor's Brigade, with the balance of Longstreet's Division, were ordered to assist General Huger in preventing their escape; but the exhausted condition of Longstreet's troops, and the distance they had to march, was the reason why they did not arrive in time. The reason why General Huger did not prevent it, has been told by those who know more about it than I do. Monday morning found the enemy strongly posted on Frazier's Farm. The enemy had chosen this position to check the pursuing rebels. The battle ground was a plain, covered with pine bushes. General Longstreet being called off, the command of his division fell upon General A. P. Hill. The enemy had a battery in position on our right, situated on a slightly elevated position. Already the roar of musketry and cannon was deafening in front. Several brigades had tried to take the battery on our right. General Pryor asked Colonel Baine if his Regiment could take that battery. The gallant Colonel replied: "My boys will take it if I tell them." Soon the Regiment was called on to execute the command. After we crossed a swamp, lying about half a mile in front of the battery, and formed a line, the brave Colonel ordered a charge. Every man rushed forward, yelling; nor did they halt until the battery was but a few yards distant, when the Colonel fell mortally wounded, and expired almost immediately on the field. Major A. C. Wood was severely wounded; Lieuts. N. M. Smith and C. M. Sneed were killed of Company A; Lieut. J. C. Strickland, of Company F, wounded; of Company D, Serg't A. H. McCarny, now 2d Lieutenant commanding, was wounded; Lieut. J. E. Mayo was killed, of C; Lieut. now Captain M. L. Barber, of C, wounded; of E, Captain H. F. Dunson was wounded; of K, Captain G. W. Taylor was wounded. But two Captains of the Regiment had escaped, viz: Capt. J. S. Williamson, of Co. B, and Capt. R. A. McCord, of Co. G. Some one ordered a retreat, and the men not knowing from whom the command came, fell back reluctantly, denying every inch of ground. Fearless Adjutant L. Pinkard succeeded in rallying the scattered regiment, which, commanded by Captain J. S. Williamson, of Company B, assisted by Captain R. A. McCord, of Co. G, made another charge. Success crowned their effort this time, though the brave old Captain fell dead in the charge.

Captain McCord and the Adjutant held the battery with only a handful of men. They were soon reinforced by another brigade. Night put an end to the contest. The regiment did not participate in the battle of Tuesday, but was near the battle ground. It remained on duty near the battle ground until the 15th of July, when it was ordered back to its old camp, near Richmond, where it remained until the 11th of August. It was ordered to Gordonsville; from there it was ordered forward—the enemy being in front. A march of three days, and we reached the Rapidan river, at Raccoon ford. From this time until the 30th of August, after marching and counter-marching on half rations, undergoing hardships and privations unheard of before in the annals of war, we reached the classic plains of Manassas. Commanded by Colonel A. C. Wood, formerly Major, the Regiment was engaged in another severe battle. Corp'l E. W. Ray, of Co. C, was again conspicuous for his daring. He bore the colors until severely wounded, and was borne from the field. As he fell, private J. A. Neil, of Company I, took the colors, and was gallantly advancing, when he fell severely wounded. Hardly had the colors fell, when private J. M. Finley, of Company C, unfurled the flag again to the breeze, and gallantly bore them until the battle was ended. He was permitted by the Colonel to carry them afterwards.

On the 1st day of September, the well known song of Maryland, My Maryland, greeted the ear at every camp. Soon the road from Manassas to Leesburg was swarming with rebel soldiers.

On the 5th of September, the Regiment crossed the Potomac, under the following commanders: 2d Corporal T. C. Meadow, commanding Co. A; Co. B, Captain S. G. Perry; Company C, Lieutenant T. A. Strahan; Company D, 2d Corporal W. T. Daniel; Company E, Lieut. J. T. McLain; Company F, Lieut. J. S. McLane; Company G, Capt. R. A. McCord; Company H, Lieut. C. H. Lamberth; Company I, Serg't J. L. Haynes; Company K, Serg't W. S. Hooper. We reached Frederick, Maryland, on the 7th. We remained there three days, and destroyed the costly railroad bridge, near that city, and taking the road for Harper's Ferry, on the 10th, we arrived there on the 13th, hungry and tired. Often we lay all day in open fields, waiting the approach of the enemy. The weather was excessively warm. On the 15th of September, the enemy surrendered 11,500 strong to General Stonewall Jackson. We recrossed the Potomac again into Virginia, on the morning of the 16th, and marched towards Sheppardstown, Va. We marched all day and all night, and reached Sheppardstown early the next morning, and recrossed the Potomac again into Maryland. A march of three miles, and we were in front of the enemy at Antietam, near the village of Sharpsburg.

The road from Harper's Ferry through Sheppardstown, on to the battle ground of Antietam, was crowded with sick and straggling soldiers. Hundreds, yes, thousands were bare-footed; many were exhausted from their many hasty marches; and I might here state that two-thirds of the subsistence our men got in Maryland, was roasting-ears. The scene, after we crossed the river, and on the field of Antietam, is difficult to describe. It was often difficult to tell which was the worst off, many of the broken down soldiers, or the wounded. The name of stragglers is a scandal to these men; for these noble men, when they arrived, went forward in mass almost without a commander, and drove the enemy before them. I saw one of these regiments, in which I think every State in the Confederacy was represented. Before we reached the battle field, the groans of the wounded that passed us in ambulances, and the roar of cannon and the rattle of musketry ahead, for the first time informed many of the men that we were on the eve of another battle. A march of a mile forward, and we halted to drop our knapsacks. The elements seemed crowded with shell, as they passed harmlessly over our heads, with now and then a stray ball from the long range rifles of the enemy. We descended the hill in front; and as we reached the top of the hill in front, the musketry of the enemy seemed as if it had just begun. From this time until night every thing in front was obscured from view by the dense smoke; and the sound that greeted the ear can't be compared to anything but a severe hail storm, accompanied by thunder and lightning. Often when our boys were ready, and only waiting the smoke to clear away, the vivid flash from the cannon of the enemy informed our men of the whereabouts of the enemy. A volley of musketry followed, again obscuring everything from view—for a moment everything seemed to be in confusion. Colonel A. C. Wood being in command of Pryor's Brigade; Captain G. W. Taylor, of Company K, was in command of the Regiment. He ordered a charge; our weary and almost exhausted boys rushed forward, but the overwhelming forces of the enemy drove our men back. Slowly and reluctantly we retreated, denying every inch of ground; night coming on the firing gradually ceased, and our men, exhausted, sank down to rest where they stood, every one expecting that the coming day would bring with it another fight.

Early the next morning our pickets and those of the enemy began firing; but both sides seemed to have done enough already. Later in the day, a flag of truce was seen approaching our lines. I never have been able to get a correct verbage of their message—suffice it to say, no terms were agreed on. Both sides were in line of battle, and this time was employed by our litter-bearers in bringing in the wounded that had fallen in exposed places. Night coming on, our men, hungry and weary for want of sleep, sank down to rest where they had lain the night previous: but about 10 o'clock at night, we received orders to fall back. By 8 o'clock next morning our whole army was on the Virginia side of the Potomac. Early on the morning of the 19th, we were drawn up in line of battle on the Virginia side of the Potomac. We remained here until late in the evening, when we received orders to fall back to Martinsburg, Va. We marched all night and camped next morning only six miles from Sheppardstown; the road though firm, was very rough. We remained here all day, and at night took up the march again; the night was very dark, and it appeared to me that all the rocks in that county might have been on the road we traveled over that night. We camped near Martinsburg the morning of the 21st of September. We remained here several days, while the Generals were employed in reorganizing the army. While here, Adjutant L. Pinkard was appointed Lieut. Colonel.

On the 27th we again took the road for Winchester; a distance of thirty miles. We marched twenty-seven miles, and halted for the night; early the next morning we moved to a more suitable camping ground. It was while we were encamped at this place that the small pox broke out in our regiment; but the men who fell victims to this loathsome disease, were sent off as soon as discovered. We left this camp, September 30th; marched through Winchester, took the road to Front Royal, marched 27 miles, and halted for the night. Early in the morning of 1st of November, cold, and many of the men bare-footed, we took the road for Culpeper C. H., waded both branches of the Shenandoah, passed through Front Royal, Flint Hill and Gaines' Cross Roads, waded both branches of the Rappahannock, and arrived at Culpeper C. H. Nov. 3d; camped north of the C. H. one mile; Nov. 7th the first snow of the season fell. This was a sleepless night to our tentless brigade; we left this camp on the 19th of Nov., and arrived at Fredericksburg the 23d; camped west of the town three miles, and north of the plank road leading to Gordonsville one mile.

On the 5th of December it snowed to the depth of six or seven inches. About 5 o'clock in the morning of the 11th of December, I was awakened by the firing of cannon. Soon the order came for the men to be in readiness. The grey streak in the eastern horizon informed us that day was breaking. The enemy had began shelling the city of Fredericksburg. The scene from the hill near our camp was beautiful. A quotation from Campbell, in his description of the battle of Warsaw, best describes it.

"Earth shook, red meteors flashed along the sky," the light of which tinged the elements with a bright-red color. Our Regiment was not engaged in the bloody battle at this place, but was in position on the extreme left of our army. Capt. Ferrie Henshaw, of the Commissary Department, having resigned on the 23d of Dec., left the Regiment. He had filled his position with credit to himself, and gave general satisfaction to the entire Regiment. His loss was keenly felt. His position is now filled by Capt. H. F. Dunson, of Company E. I have thus given the principal events connected with the service of the 14th Alabama Regiment to this time, and which I hope will not be uninteresting to those who read it.

March, 1863.

APPENDIX.

Since the foregoing history of the 14th Alabama Regiment was in print, the great battles about Chancellorsville were fought, and we append a list of the casualties of the 14th Alabama Regiment, which happened on that occasion, together with a brief account of our movements previous to the commencement of the battles.

We remained in camp near the residence of Doctor Taylor until about the first of April. We moved camp up the river, where we would be more convenient to our defences at Bank's Ford, but still keeping up our same old picket line. The winter had been very severe and wood scarce, and the men were proud to get into so dense a forest of oaks once more to camp. Nothing transpired to disturb the usual routine of camp duties until the 28th of April; when heavy cannonading was heard up the river. We soon received the intelligence that the enemy were crossing at United States Ford, and points above and below. Early in the morning of the 29th, we were called into line, and marched to our breast-works near Bank's Ford. We remained there but a short time, when we received orders to repair to the scene of action, about one and a half miles west of the fork of the Plank and Turnpike roads leading to Gordonsville. We were ordered to take a position on the extreme right of our lines, next to the river; if no enemy showed himself in front, to scour the woods for him. Scouts were thrown out on each side; the main portion of our Brigade marched for some distance without interruption and halted for the scout's report. The scouts on our right captured three of the straggling enemy near Decker heights, night coming on—it was very dark. We stacked arms on the side of the road and lay down to sleep; but we were not allowed to repose long. We received orders to move to a position between the Plank road and Turnpike road, and near Wilderness creek. We had just stacked our arms and laid down, hoping that we would be allowed to rest until morning, when we received orders to march back to Bank's Ford. We had already marched nearly twelve miles, and most of that in double-quick; however, the men promptly obeyed the order. We marched back to the Ford before mentioned, arriving there just before the dawn of day. In a few minutes every man was asleep and quiet, save some straggling soldier, inquiring for his company. The next day we remained quiet in comparison with what was going on up the river. At night we occupied the same position that we did the night previous. The roar of cannon up the river could be distinctly heard all night. Early the next morning we were marched down near Fredericksburg. We soon received the news that the enemy were crossing at the city, and that General Barksdale, with his Mississippians, who had been left to hold the city, wanted reinforcements. The day (Sunday) was very warm; however, we started in double-quick, but we were too late. The enemy had discovered that the place was defended but by a small force, and they succeeded in flanking the position, and drove the gallant Mississippians from their breast-works. The slaughter on both sides was awful.

General Wilcox acting in concert with General Barksdale, threw out skirmishers, and began falling back. We retreated to Salem Church, on the Plank road, $2\frac{1}{2}$ or 3 miles from the city, formed a line determined to give him battle. General Lee having been notified of our condition, sent portions of McLaw's and Anderson's Divisions to our support. We had hardly formed the line of battle before the troops of McLaws began to arrive. Wilcox's Brigade composed of the 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th and 14th Alabama Regiments was across the Plank Road at right angles. The 11th and 14th Alabama Regiments were posted on the side of the road next to the river, the balance of the Brigade on the opposite side of the road. Our men had no protection save that afforded by a brush fence. We were not allowed to remain idle long, the enemy advanced cheering and shouting, our boys were lying quietly waiting for them to advance, at length the enemy came in sight; our boys still lying impatiently waiting for orders to charge, and whether the order was ever given or not, I am not able to say, almost before I knew it, several officers, among whom, I noticed were Lieut. W. Dozier, of Company D., as he hallooed out, "come on boys, we'll get our blankets back," officers and men went over the brush fence, with a shout that echoed for miles along the Rappahannock, rushed upon the insolent foe, who at first retreated slowly and sullenly, but our boys pressed them closely, and they soon struck a trot to keep out of reach of our bayonets. We drove this line of the enemy's back upon their reserve until we were ordered to fall back. We fell back in good order to our former position. This is what may be termed an open field fight, as no breastworks were on either side. The battle ground is an open field. In this short fight we lost 11 men killed dead on the field; two of whom were promising young officers, viz: Second Lieutenant H. M. Cox, of Company K., and Second Junior Lieutenant M. L. Bankston, of Company C.; 113 officers and men wounded, and 36 officers and men missing. Night coming on, a heavy skirmishing party was thrown forward, our main line resting behind the brush they held previous to the charge. The men that night, almost without a spade or pick, threw up with tin plates and their hands a breastwork sufficient to protect them from musketry. The manner in which they worked was, that several men in every company would loosen the earth with their bayonets, the balance of the men throwing out the dirt with tin plates and hands. On Wednesday our Brigade returned to the camp it occupied before the battle.
